Washington, DC: This year marks the 25th anniversary of the Congressional art competition, which brings together thousands of high school students from across the country seeking to represent their congressional districts.

The winning entries hang in a hallway within the U.S. Capitol complex in Washington, DC for one year.

More than 50 students from around the 14th congressional district submitted entries, which were previewed by judges and the public during a 10-day open house in Galveston. Congratulations are in order for the following participants:
