[redacted] Library of Congress called and stated that a correspondent of the Library was interested in obtaining some information about Dutch Schultz. When Schultz was dying he made a statement which was quoted to some length in the New York Times. [redacted] asked if our interest in Schultz was such that an analysis of this statement had been made. I explained to him Schultz was engaged in the liquor racket and that our interest was merely to apprehend him and turn him over to the proper authorities. Upon [redacted] request, I referred him to the Alcohol Tax Unit of the Treasury Department as a possible reference.

[redacted] then asked if we had any psychiatrists employed with this organization. I told him we did not. He then asked if we had any dictionaries of the slang used by criminals. I told him we did not but that such books were in existence. He then read to me the following "A boy who never wept nor bathed a thousand times." and asked if I knew what it meant. I told him I did not.

INFORMATION CONCERNING

visited the New York Office and made available a clipping from the NEW YORK TIMES column in the New York Post of February 14, 1949. This clipping contained the following information:

"One of the most hunted prizes in America is the fortune of the late BUTCH SCHLITZ. The books covering the last two weeks of his life showed an $800,000 gross. The FBI, Treasury Dept. and S.I. agencies haven't been able to uncover a penny of that millions... The slain gangster's disbarred lawyer, WILLIAMS, now conducts a thriving ice-cream business in Los Angeles. The only fear is that some of SCHLITZ' surviving henchmen may possess the key to knowledge of the buried fortune. 'If I knew where the money is', said WILLIAMS, 'I'd tell the government, because the informant's share alone would make me rich.'"
